

REVIEW - Twelfth Night

By Karen Richards

Despite a promo featuring a Barbie doll dressed in Shakespearean robes, I was not overly excited about seeing Worle Operatic and Dramatic Society's (WODS) production of Twelfth Night. Based on what I could remember about Shakespeare from my school days, I thought it might be a bit dull and dry.

I accepted more for the fact I love amateur dramatic groups and also because I had never seen a performance in the quirky and tiny, Theatre In The Hut before and was intrigued.

Sometimes however, having no preconceptions about how an evening is going to pan out, results in the best night ever – and this was one of those. The play was outstanding and easily one of the funniest things I have ever seen.

The talented cast were all awesome in their mostly over-the-top roles and the enjoyment and enthusiasm thrown into their individual performances was massively apparent, adding up to a phenomenal and unforgettable show.

The story of unrequited love, lost souls, mistaken identity, lust and laughter was actually much easier to follow than I thought it would be, thanks to modern twists. The amusing way the end of the scenes were played out by classic songs which summed up the plot of that scene were a fantastic way of explaining the storyline for people who are not familiar with it. ■
